Family medicine is a medical specialty dedicated to comprehensive health care for individuals of all ages. Family medicine practitioners are general practitioners who examine and treat patients with a wide range of conditions and refer those with severe ailments to a specialist or appropriate facility. The typical duties and responsibilities of a family medicine practitioner include looking over patients' medical histories, performing or requesting diagnostic tests, making diagnoses, prescribing treatments, administering vaccinations, performing follow-up examinations, as well as educating patients on disease prevention and health maintenance.

Women's health practitioners have the advanced education and training necessary to provide primary and specialty care to women throughout their lives. They focus on reproductive, obstetric, and gynecological health. The typical duties and responsibilities of a women's health practitioner include looking over patients' medical histories, conducting physical examinations, prescribing pharmacologic treatments, performing minor surgeries, as well as educating women on preventive measures to avoid illness.
