The practical session of the HR seminar conducted on Tuesday involved discussions as well as role play. The best part about this training that students particularly liked the most was the practical session that helped students learn the staffing and recruiting practices embraced by RGIT itself. Some of the vital factors that this Human resource seminar focused on were the issues that have an influence on the overall staffing processes, including the recruitment and selection part, the role played by managers, supervisors, and other staff members in the recruitment and selection process of the employees as well as team members, and the role of the human resource department in listing, evaluating, and selection processes.

RGIT has three campuses in Melbourne and Hobart. The HR seminar was organised at the Melbourne campus but the institute also invited the business and management students from Hobart campus to join the practical lessons through teleconference. This helped the management students of both the campus to attend the seminar and learn the crucial human resource elements that are adopted by the RGIT college itself. All the students of RGIT became the part of this seminar organised at Melbourne campus to help accomplish the conditions of managing recruitment, induction, and selection processes.
