

Josiah & The Greater Good's 'Shot Down' is a Musical Revival of Hybrid and Edgy Genre Variations

Find the best-amalgamated modulations of rock, blues, jazz, and funk thematic insinuations with the incredible sound of Josiah & The Greater Good's song 'Shot Down'.

Knoxville, Dec 31, 1969 (IssueWire.com) - Call it indie or a classified distinction of genre categorization, Josiah & The Greater Good is a band here to glam up the scene with their vivid introspection of rock, blues, soul, jazz, funk, and pop traces that all come together with a lyrical flow of mesmerizing themes. Their newly released song 'Shot Down' follows the league of rock riffs along with the elements of funk and groovy timbre depicting the saga of obsessive one-sided love. The lyrical intensity of 'Shot Down' is both figurative and metaphorical as everyone shares empathetic belongingness with its musical progression. The many crevices of melodic and arrangement dynamics of 'Shot Down' rounded beautifully with the subtly of soft saxophone make the perfect flavoring of a band that has the independent creative flair to them.

Hailing from Knoxville, Tennessee, Josiah Atchley is a marine-turned-musician, who along with his band comprising of Frank Sheadrick Jr on drums, Jon Augustus on bass, Brandon Bowman on saxophone, Joey Pierce on lead, Mark Radice on keys, and himself as the frontman and rhythm guitarist has created the best combinative musical efforts with Josiah & The Greater Good. Their popularity has already traveled miles that gave him the exposure of sharing the stage with musical head-turners like Tom Keifer, Kansas, and Fastball.

Josiah & The Greater Good's biggest inspirers including John Mayer, Eric Clapton, Pink Floyd, and others have shaped their sound into one of a kind. With their other hits including 'Gypsy', 'Broken Man', and 'Otherside' and their upcoming album 'Relapse' up for a release, their cultural growth is only expanding to a more commendable one.
