Inspiration for the hit single, "Cost of Doin' Business", came from Fifth's experience growing up as a Jehovah's Witness and the hardships he faced since leaving the religion. The powerful anthem celebrates individuals who are staying true to who they are, regardless of the consequences. "I would like to inspire people to live in their truth, whatever that maybe," Fifth says, "I want to motivate people to embrace their own unique gifts and talents and empower them to be their authentic selves."

Emerging San Francisco Bay Area artist is also working on his first album entitled, "One Year Old," which describes the challenging journey of self-discovery after leaving a belief system that was once an integral part of his identity. A line from his single "Cost of Doin' Business" sums it up best: "I'd rather have questions I can't answer than answers I can't question." His new album is set to be released later
