Countries around the world are doing their best to contain the impact of coronavirus or COVID-19. The sudden increase of people needing medical care has placed a burden on the health care system. Many hospitals are running out of beds to care for infected patients, and they are also running out of vital supplies to treat those patients and to protect front-line medical staff.

The primary factor in COVID-19's spread is its infection rate. Those with the flu infect an average of one other person. Those with COVID-19, on the other hand, infect an average of three people. Medical experts estimate these numbers by learning about patient behavior and the areas they visited before showing symptoms. It's important to remember these numbers are only based on the number of cases about which the medical world learns. Such observations create very worrying future predictions.

Some experts believe up to 14% of COVID-19 patients will require supplemental oxygen and other medical care. The rapid spread of COVID-19 combines with its often-mild symptoms to infect a large number of people. Most hospitals were not prepared to handle the massive influx of patients caused by the COVID-19 outbreak. Since medical supplies are running out, much medical staff fear they won't be able to provide care to everyone who needs it. Hospital staff say they don't fear the coronavirus, as much as they worry about the shortage of protective gear to keep them from catching the disease and spreading it to patients.

Supply chain and flexibility for hospital deliveries becomes critical at this point. Hospitals during COVID-19 outbreak relies on a steady supply of medication and other inventory, any supply disruptions could cause severe consequences.

Some people and businesses are taking the COVID-19 outbreak as an opportunity to express companies' values, inspire their employees and do good for others. Unlimited Carrier Inc. has dedicated more than 50 trucks from their fleet to deliver medical supplies between hospitals and to those who need them the most.
